Class Day One: Introduction to Diplomacy and Negotiation

For centuries, relations between states have required the development of rules acceptable to all to facilitate political, economic, and cultural ties and make them mutually beneficial. International Relations theories were also crafted to explain decisions by state actors in their interaction, for some motivated mainly by the search for national interests and security, for others by a reliance on alliances or organizations designed to promote cooperation and address common challenges. Negotiation was and still is at the heart of international relations whether in a bilateral, regional, or multilateral context.

Class Day Two: Traditional and Human Security Challenges in International Relations

States have been traditionally confronted to so-called “hard” security challenges and threats that included armed conflict, invasions, annexations, imperialism, colonialism, terrorism, etc. This has been often expressed by military spending, arms build-up and proliferation. At the end of the Cold War, although such traditional challenges didn’t disappear, the focus shifted to so-called human security challenges and risks, meaning threats to the security of individuals and groups in areas such as job security, food security, health security, climate security, violation of human rights, etc.

Class Day Three: Responses to Traditional and Human Security Challenges

Responses to traditional security threats were carried out with military means nationally or in military alliances and were often illustrated by great-power competition. International responses included conflict prevention, conflict analysis, conflict management, peacekeeping, conflict resolution, peacebuilding, etc. Responses to human security challenges take place with multilateral and regional cooperative mechanisms: regional and universal organizations; the UN Security Council; "minilateralism" (G7, G20, BRICS, etc.), environment and climate diplomacy; health diplomacy; human rights diplomacy; multilateral action against terrorism and organized crime; economic, trade, and development diplomacy including the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), etc.

Class Day Four: Intercultural Communication and Negotiation

Diplomacy was traditionally conducted in a confidential manner while modern diplomacy, mainly multilateralism, requires openness, transparency, communication skills, accountability, and a growing role for non-state actors. Negotiation, whether bilateral or multilateral, also requires specific skills and can be developed also in times of crisis.

Class Day Five: Communication and Chairing Skills, Rules of Protocol and Etiquette

As a key diplomatic activity both in bilateral and multilateral frameworks, communication can become a decisive asset for national or regional interests and successful negotiation. This also applies to the skills of conducting and chairing meetings. Rules of Protocol and Etiquette have been developed to facilitate diplomatic relations. Finally, to sum up the module, it is important to be able to prioritize security policy in the medium or long term, especially in a conflict or crisis situation.
